Earth's mountains unto God are consecrate-The footstool of the everlasting throne; There, in his thunders robed, in awful state The Omnipotent comes down.

Olympus-Sinai-still preserve the trace; Mount Horeb, starting, bent his step beneath; Hor heard his voice; Gilbon saw his face; Golgotha wept his death !

Thou God whom Hebron-Lebanon did fear-Who did'st thy glory to their rocks unfold-Still on the height we seek Thee! Lingers here Thy presence as of old? Say, peaceful tenants of this holy height-

From these lone summits, in the ealm of night, Oh, hear ye nought of Heaven? See ye not oft the white-plumed angel bands

As at the mount where Israel's law was given-

Descending, pause your hallowed domes around ? Hear ye not harp-strings swept by scraph hands Making the rocks resound?

A JUDICIAL SKETCH. There was a judicial functionary residing in Boston. some years since, whose legal achmen, and profundity only equalled his general force of character otherwise; and who was a man " not to be sneezed at" - at least when he was seated upon the bench of the Police Court, where he presided two or three days in each week. When seen in the act of delivering an opinion, the learned judge was a " picture to behold;" and when he finally got it off, his was an opinion as was an opinion, and nothing else.

But the judge was very like other people in one tespect-he would eat! And as he wended his way slowly across Tremont Row, to dinner one day, his attention was arrested by the display of sundry " heads of people," in Southworth's daguerreotype show-case. The idea suddenly struck him that his own countenance wasn't a bad 'un for a picture-so he found his way up stairs, at once, into the reception toom.

"What's the price of that size f" he asked of the polite attendant.

" Five dollars, sir." " And this?"

"Three dollars."

"Could'nt you put me on that for three?" pointing to the largest plate.

"We have but the regular prices; sir." "Yes, I know. But you see I'm one of the judges at the court-p'lce court-and these dog'ratype places are getting to be so very numerous in this community."
